Version.In the manufacture of food and pharmaceutical products, it is often necessary to sterilize the articles being processed. In most instances, sterilization is accomplished by introducing steam into the interior of the articles for a period of time. For articles of high value, the steam sterilization process must be conducted at high temperatures. The conditions which are required for steam sterilization vary widely from one product to another. For instance, pharmaceutical products should be sterilized at high temperatures and low pressures, but food products must be sterilized at relatively low temperatures and relatively high pressures. Because the steam sterilization process is not extremely time efficient, it is often necessary to expose the articles to the steam for an extended period of time. It is desirable to have the heat exchange equipment which is used to process articles of both types. The present invention provides a compact, inexpensive heat exchanger which is specifically designed to meet the needs of a steam sterilization process.
