New details have been released about the ancient elephant bones that were discovered in northern Italy earlier this year, confirming that the bones are indeed more than 1,000 years old. An analysis published in the journal Scientific Reports in late July revealed the bones belonged to a young, young elephant, and that the animal was probably less than 30 years old at the time of its death. The researchers who analyzed the bones also stated that the bones are the remains of two elephants, but they only described the bones in general terms, saying they belonged to “a juvenile of large size” and “a mature elephant of slightly larger size.” In a statement released Monday, archaeologists involved with the dig said further analysis of the bones is due to be published this month. The new study, entitled “Ancient elephant bones shed light on probable diets of migrating Southern African elephants,” will address the question of whether the elephants were of sub-Saharan African or African hunting elephant ancestry. The initial discovery was made in March, while the excavators were cleaning a hillside in a silty area near the town of Tortona in northern Italy. A local hunter unearthed the bones while collecting insects in a damp forest and notified local authorities of the find. Since then, approximately 75 of the bones — each ranging in length between 25 and 40 centimeters (about 10 and 16 inches) — have been unearthed. Experts have been analyzing the bones for the past two months, but because of the amount of work they have been doing in the field, they said the bones will not be cleaned and sent off to the laboratory until later this month. “The animal is young, could not have been more than 15 or 16 years old,” said the anthropologist Roberto Pinotti in the statement. “The age, on the basis of teeth, is confirmed by the X-ray images of some vertebrae, and the absence of the radius and ulna in the left hind
