(Photo: REUTERS/Jonathan Ernst) A new Center for the Study of Childhood Education in Public Life report from Washington's George Mason University shows that spending on charter schools has grown rapidly since 2003, particularly after the passage of federal educational law No Child Left Behind (NCLB). While charter school students tend to be at higher risk for dropping out of school and living in poverty, the report finds that charter schools are actually more effective than traditional public schools. It's tempting to think that charter schools are a band-aid on a much bigger problem, that the skyrocketing costs are just a symptom of the larger problems plaguing America's public education system. But as we saw with the teachers' unions and public education from a Republican president, giving up on the current public education system is giving up on the future of our country. This chart from the report illustrates the massive explosion of charter schools in a short period of time. Note that even though states began authorizing charter schools in significant numbers in the early 2000s, there were only 100 charter schools in 2006, when the Obama administration initiated the "Race to the Top" grants program, and that number rose to 6,000 at the end of the 2010 school year. Charter school enrollment grew at a rate of 65% in the 2006-07 school year, growing to 30,000 students by the 2010-11 school year. The average school-age child in the United States is required to attend a public school. But as the chart shows, an estimated 30 million children who would be attending public schools don't end up in public schools -- the vast majority of them are in charter schools. Public schools have become the first choice for children in a large swath of the country, especially for children in low-income communities. The report finds that charter schools are a particularly strong option for these communities. But a key finding of the report is that charters are actually more effective than traditional public schools, especially when it comes to student performance on standardized tests. The report concludes that when students are matched with the right teachers and school, charters are 77a5ca646e

Now I want to add another column (lets call it "Type") to that table, where every user (ID) will either have an entry with a type "O" or a type "R". What is the best solution to do this in one query?
