Abstract): Rapid behavioral development of infant mammals requires an intact and functioning placenta. Little is known about this fascinating organ, or how the placenta communicates with the fetus. One such stimulus is the ingestion of placental lactogen by the fetus. Placental lactogen is the only maternal-derived hormone secreted by the placenta. Lactogen is thought to activate specific receptors, termed growth hormone receptors (GHR) that are expressed in the fetal brain. The central premise of this proposal is that placenta-derived lactogen alters the behavior of the infant by interacting with these GHR. In order to test this hypothesis, Specific Aims are proposed to test lactogen activity using behavioral paradigms sensitive to the behavioral effects of growth hormone. The first is to identify changes in the behavioral response to stress in infants who have a functional placenta. If lactogen is indeed a physiological stimulus for stress responses, then the hormonal state of the mother could influence the
