I would like to know if there are things I can do to reduce the number of HTTP requests:. A silly question, but this is a challenge I am looking at tackling. A: As Mark mentioned, rewriting your controllers to take advantage of your new framework will help quite a bit. I implemented a bit more in depth tuning (such as caching of logic and not calling the database everytime) and it helped quite a bit. A: Then you'll have to identify the bottlenecks in your application, and figure out what is not optimized for the new framework, and make sure to work around that. For instance, if everytime your application calls a db you Store some key/value data for the db call Store some output to e.g. a json file That would be an overhead that should be avoided in your new architecture. How do you do these three tasks? Think of what you do with all your database logic. Store some data. Log something to the screen. These are three high-level tasks you can think of. Now try to think of how you could move that to your application layer. For instance, if you don't use sql you could run all your stuff in the background on multiple servers and then store some data for each task. It might not even require you to write all that, because maybe someone else has done all the work for you. The whole point is to find the best way to optimize your app for the new framework. A: If you're using ng-repeat, then you should use a $index for the items to show and use a $watch for the items to only have a single view / update instead of doing one on each item. If you have a lot of models in your system, you may even want to separate out the model logic into separate controllers / services. Another thing to look at is how you use jQuery. For example, if you do something like this: `$('#div.some-thing').click(function () {... });` That will trigger on every click on every element with the class "some-thing". You'd want to write it like this to wait for the click to happen: `$('#some-thing').click(function (e) {... });` That way only one element can be clicked on at a time and doesn't matter what the other click events are. If your

Q: Is this Magento website insecure and dangerous to serve as the main entry point to an application? The site in question is Note: the links should become clickable, but they are not yet. That page is currently considered to be in beta and in an early state of development. Some of the functionality shown in the screenshot below is not yet implemented. For me, it makes sense to move this website to its own URL on the same server as the main application. That is, I do not believe that there is a risk of cross-site scripting and other insecurities by doing this. However, I was unable to find any information on whether it is safe to serve as the main entry point to an application. Please, I'm just asking out of general curiosity. Thank you very much.

A: It's not like you're serving a direct link to credit card information. You have to be logged in and you have to accept the license agreement before any secure information will be sent to you. There's no chance for cross site scripting if you're already logged in or if you accept the license agreement. This is one of the reason why browsers allow you to do most of these login screens through AJAX, that way they don't have to download any of the javascript code and execute it. , with a wide variety of applications.
